prepared humans are to interact with the robot. Give it something resembling a face, and movements that begin to mirror human actions, then people become more interactive, and project feelings and narratives onto that inanimate object. This brings into play concerns about the extent to which humans can become attached to robots.

For the moment, at least, robots are a human artifact. We may not be able to
stop the automation
wave, but we can help
guide it -- and we can
respond to it in wise,
humane ways.

Technology is not an
alien force.
